Conclusion

The figures showed no consistent differences between cousin and non-cousin fertility and child mortality rates which could suggest that genetic or endemic disease factors might be involved.

Cousin marriages showed a slightly higher percentage of fertile women and a much greater fertility per woman as a whole except for marriages lasting between six and ten years.

In both categories infant mortality was highest among boys in the first year of life but after that the proportion between them varied with age at marriage of the woman and the length of the marriage.

Infertility in cousin marriages was conspicuously high for women who married before twenty years of age.

It is considered that the explanation of these figures will be found in individual ill-health and in social factors relating amongst others to marital stability and family care.

Acknowledgments

My grateful acknowledgments for advice and criticism are given to Dr. D. Clyde of the Tanganyika Medical Department and to Messrs. Goldthorpe and Southall of the East African Institute of Social Research.
